How the Framework Convention on Global Health (FCGH) should address funding for underlying determinants of health

Submitted November 29, 2013, by Professor Brigit Toebes, University of Groningen

Brigit Toebes, PhD
Senior Lecturer – Rosalind Franklin Fellow
Faculty of Law
Department of International and Constitutional Law
University of Groningen
Oude Kijk in 't Jatstraat 26, 9700 AS, PoBox 716, Groningen, the Netherlands
0031(0)503635676
B.C.A.Toebes@rug.nl
www.rug.nl

Costs of underlying determinants of health: What would be the cost of ensuring everyone each of the underlying determinants of health (see section on Ensuring For All Universal Conditions of Good Health, including footnotes 3 and 4, and questions addressing which underlying determinants [and public health measures] the FCGH would include)?

It will be very difficult to point out what are the most important determinants - and not to define something that is too broad. At the same time it seems vital. For this, it seems important to assess the right to health in conjunction with the other economic and social rights, including the right to education (possibly the most important one), the right to housing, and generally the right to an adequate standard of living. Another important question: are the social determinants of health congruent to the underlying determinants of health, as defined in General Comment 14 (see also Audrey Chapman who makes some critical remarks about this issue [http://www.hhrjournal.org/wp-content/uploads/sites/13/2013/07/4-Chapman.pdf])? It seems that the social determinants go further, by also looking at the 'causes of the causes' of health, i.e., even going back to how society is structured.